

WHEN MARKICIA HORTON graduates this spring from the Texas Southern University's Thurgood Marshall School of Law in Houston and takes the bar, she'll be stepping into a world where a Black woman is set to be on the US Supreme Court for the first time in its 232-year history. With Stephen Breyer's retirement from the court and President Joe Biden's commitment to name a Black

US President Joe Biden AP/PTI

woman as his nominee, it is likely that, as the 25-year-old Horton moves into a profession, there will be a Black woman as a

Supreme Court justice. What that means for her and thousands of other young women of colour in law schools or serving as lawyers around the country is incalculable. But it also comes with concerns. According to the National Association for Law Placement, Black women made up 3.17% of associates at America's law firms in 2021 but less than 1% of partners. Women of colour overall made up nearly

16% of associates at America's law firms but only about 4% of the partners. And across the federal bench, Black women hold 45 of the 850 lifetime appointments to district and appeals judgeship, or about 5%, according to government data. "I feel like it's really important to have African Americans in positions that really do affect us," said Horton, who has a bachelor's degree in geoscience. AP
